The world of work is evolving faster than ever. Employees now expect work-life balance, flexibility, and a personalized approach. This business breakfast broadened the conversation, considering these expectations alongside the perspectives and options available to employers.

In our engaging panel discussion, we focused on flexibility as a crucial factor for competitiveness and success, enhancing employee motivation and retention. However, the legal framework, business strategy, and employer positioning must also be considered, and finding the right balance between employee expectations and company capabilities remains a challenge.

Our discussion confirmed that the question is no longer if flexibility should be implemented, but how to do so effectively. Implementing flexibility requires a strategic approach, supported by clear processes, legal frameworks, and most importantly, a culture of open communication and trust. We had the opportunity to listen to valuable employer experience on how to implement these approaches effectively while remaining compliant with the law.
